CANNABIS AND PTSD

Scientific studies report that cannabis ingestion may help quality of life and lead to other significant benefits. PTSD is a condition that can occur when someone suffers after experiencing trauma or difficult life circumstances. These events can create emotional or physical harm and can sometimes be life-threatening. Symptoms include: intrusive thoughts, avoidance, mood/cognitive changes, and can be reactive and irritable.

PTSD can be treated with pharmaceutical medications, cognitive behavioral therapy, and neck injections (ganglion block). More recently alternative therapies include: lycopene (found in many fruits and vegetables), acupuncture, yoga, and cannabis. Eighty five percent of those who have been diagnosed with PTSD also have reduced endocannabinoid levels and cortisol levels. Since cannabis interacts with the endocannabinoid system it may help with some of the fundamental imbalances associated with this condition. There are numerous favorable studies that have been done in the US, Canada, and the UK.
